History of Photoshop In 1984, a marketing team at Adobe revolutionized the creation and presentation of images when they created Photoshop. Designers and photographers at the time had used the variety of software created by other companies, including Photoshop's progenitor, MacPaint. These products tended to be text-based and often used graphic overlays, or layers, to create and manipulate raster images. Photoshop was created in response to a change in the marketplace, particularly the rise of "hypercolor" printers that could produce the maximum color depth of 24 bits per pixel. Because of this shift in color technology, the workflow and color management process of industry professionals was disrupted. Other companies, including U.S. Robotics' Mac-based Paintbox and Apple's famous MacPaint, could edit both text and images by way of overlays. Adobe's Macintosh user base also required a new product that could manage the workflow of printing and publishing. Photoshop, a fully featured program, would allow users to edit images at every stage of the process. Originally, users could load a document into Photoshop and then edit the document in the same program. However, Adobe revolutionized the editing process when it introduced Photoshop layers. With layers, users could manipulate an image as if it were a stack of transparent graphics, and text could be placed on top of other texts or graphics. Photoshop's layers allowed users to move, copy, paste, or delete layers one by one, rather than having to scrap the entire image. Because layers could be combined and manipulated, color managers could be implemented in Photoshop. This meant that users could quickly and efficiently make adjustments to color-managed documents. The importance of color management in the professional printing industry cannot be overstated. Because colors were closely controlled at the time, having a color management system such as Photoshop was critical. Today, because of the relatively open nature of the internet, color can be a problem. Color can quickly become misrepresented as a result of low color quality, and color accuracy is extremely important in many industries. ## Adobe Photoshop 2022 (Version 23.2) 2022

Cleaners, dust, and yard care products can benefit from the compressive strength and flow-inducing properties of granular hydrogels. These gels generally contain poly(N-isopropylacrylamide) ("PNIPAM") and have a modulus of 1 to 1,000 MPa, with higher modulus being preferred for certain cleaners, dusts, and yard care products. It would be desirable to provide a method to produce all-polymer granules containing PNIPAM, at levels well-above 10% by weight, for use in cleaners, dusts, and yard care products. Many cleaning and dust removal fluids contain a PNIPAM solution. Some products, such as washing powders, foams, and detergent products, use a gel. Gels that contain PNIPAM are known, see e.g., U.S. Pat. No. 5,972,247. In order to increase the amount of PNIPAM in the formulation, or for other reasons, it would be desirable to have granules that are not only flowable, but are compressible, so that they can be readily dispersed or flowed into a container. The compressibility makes the dispersion of the particles easy and inexpensive, and the flow properties make for efficient application. In cleaning and dust removal products, flow of a gel is beneficial. Copolymers, particularly those derived from acrylamide and crosslinked acrylamide, can be used for polymerization in high solids as described in U.S. patent application Ser. Nos. 09/293,771 and 09/688,292. The copolymer particles formed tend to stick to one another when prepared in high solids, so that they cannot be mixed together. The higher solids obtained using the process described in Ser. Nos. 09/293,771 and 09/688,292 have the same tendency. It would be desirable to make larger, lower density granules having a higher solids content. It is known to form PNIPAM-based polymers by mixing and extruding a gel-forming polymer (e.g., a water-soluble polymer), an organic solvent, and a non-solvent (e.g., ethanol) together to form a batch. The batch is then milled to produce a powder. The powder can be mixed with the desired weight of water to produce the gel, and the gel is then heated.
